

Ashley Lange

T/Th 9:40

Weather

After a burst of spring showers, the recent cool temperatures were a welcome relief before temperatures begin heating up again in the Phoenix area.

Showers dotted the valley on March 22 and 23 and cooled off the previous weeks of record setting temperatures in the high 90s. The rest of the week was significantly cooler, dropping to the early 70s.

However, the cool temperatures should not last much longer, according to Accuweather.com. By the end of the week, temperatures should reach the early 90s again, although they shouldn't get quite as hot as earlier in the month.

When asked about the temperature drop, Adam Massaud, a journalism sophomore said, "I dislike it when it's sweltering outside," Massaud said. "I like the temperature right now, when it's still cool out sometimes." After hearing that the weekend should warm up, Massaud seemed dismissive. "Well, it is Phoenix. You don't really get a choice."

Not everyone is concerned about the heat. "Honestly, I love the heat. I can get tan and finally stop wearing jackets to class," Laura Hurtig, a freshman supply-chain management major said about the forecast.

"Weather is most of the reason I decided to come to Phoenix for school."