Changes Route 66

Route 66 was developed for one reason and one reason only—transportation from coast to coast. Through this great endeavor, construction sprouted with not only the highway, but also with businesses and towns. Towns developed for the mere fact that they were located on Route 66. Over time Route 66 was not large enough for the growth of the country and the amount of people traveling along. Some portions were recreated on top of the original road; moreover, completely new routes were created and were sometimes only 100 feet away. Landscapes changed along with the road and new development sprouted while old businesses died. Through this tour of Arizona's Route 66 the viewer will see the changes, whether slight or extreme, those changes of landscape are there.
