Course Description

In this course, we focus on the translation from Russian into English of selections from literary texts with special attention to stylistic considerations in a historical context. The development of the Russian literary language in the eighteenth century occurred in conjunction with the introduction of such basic features of a public literary life as a new “civic alphabet” in 1710, to distinguish between religious and secular writings, the printing press, newspapers, journals, grammars, and dictionaries. Questions over what kind of Russian constituted a literary language shaped the larger debate between Slavophiles and Westernizers. Writers responded to pressures to modernize and expand Russian to include foreign words, close the gap between written and spoken Russian through a standard literary language, and develop a full array of secular genres.

The various lexical registers include the mixing of religious and vernacular styles in Baroque Russian, the ethnographic interest in folk language in the nineteenth century, and the development of Sovietisms, prison culture, mat, pornography, and the Internet in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. The rapid, various changes in the Russian language today reflect the backlash against the linguistic conformity of the Soviet period, and recall the literary ferment of the three centuries, with for example, the uncensored publication finally of Russia’s first erotic poet, Ivan Barkov (1732-68). We will also read selections from treatises and essays on the development of a unified Russian literary language, in addition to semiotic interpretations of the historical dynamic of the Russian language.

Requirements
